ABOUT THIS CALL FOR ENTRY

Women have been actively involved with photography since the medium's inception in 1839. The barriers to their participation were lower than in the other arts, and recognition often came faster. Yet women and their photographs have not been as visible as they should have been in view of their numbers and past influence. Only in fairly recent exhibitions and critical writings have women's work in photography received due consideration.

This International Call for Entry invited women from around the world to submit photographs that demonstrate a smart, critical take on women with cameras in this day of a more open and subtle notion of gendered identity.

Submissions were only limited by imagination and could cover a broad range of challenging, personal, emotional, and political issues facing women today. Their work-life, home, family, friends, relationships, life partners, homosexual, heterosexual, politics, equal rights, stereotypes, causes, roles and wishes.

A NOTE FROM EXHIBIT CURATOR, CHRISTINA CHANG

When I was a young girl, I believed that it was possible for gender—or any marker of identity, for that matter—to be beside the point. This belief was born of a deep desire to trust in humankind’s inherent goodness. I realize now, in hindsight, that it was also a defensive position, absolving me of guilt before the fact. I had been introduced to critical theories of gender, race and class in college, but it wasn’t until graduate school, where I engaged in sustained study of the most celebrated voices of these ideas, that I began to understand the very real stakes of these discussions—in short, why they mattered. As for the personal stakes, I was forced to reckon with my own apoliticism, which I had always considered to be fair-minded neutrality, in debates with my highly politicized friends.

I have lived in Minneapolis less than a year, but the city has given me ample opportunities to flex my burgeoning political consciousness. I was asked to join LAUNCH, a subcommittee of the Minnesota Women’s Campaign Fund that targets young women. It was fortuitous, then, to be asked to jury this competition, the first at MPC to focus solely on the achievements of women, as well as the first to be juried by a woman. In the call for entries I posed the very question of photography that I had been wondering myself: why does it matter that a woman is doing it?

I looked for photographs that challenged me to see a woman’s experience in them, that were foreign to my own sense of what it meant to be a woman. I turned to the work of Judith Butler, a renowned feminist and queer theorist, for her understanding of the radical potential implicit in identity categories. Rather than being frustrated by the impossibility of a label such as woman having the capacity to represent the beautifully complex and variegated ways of actually being a woman, Butler argues that this is precisely the reason why we are able to continually diversify and evolve new understandings of what that identity means.

The process of judging the show was incredibly rewarding. I was deeply moved by and proud of the number of women artists with strong voices who participated. At the same time, I was acutely aware of the hypocrisy of separating this pool of artists, who had for decades struggled to be visible, into “in” and “out” groups. Ultimately though, 125 photographs had to be selected. I hope the viewer has at least one encounter with a fresh new way of seeing (as) a woman.
